HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, July 18.

REPORTED the cotton duty, iron, and steel tools, and British fishery bills.

Passed the brick and piles duty, flask duty, and gold and silver plate bills.

The order of the day for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on the Irish resolutions being then read, Earl Fitzwilliam wished that the noble Lord (Sydney) high in office, would now fulfil an engagement which the noble Lord made a few days since to their Lordships, that he would give an explanation of the necessity and expediency of the present resolutions. To remove the obscurity with which they were veiled was worthy the noble Lord, and he trusted that, on the present occasion, the doubts he had, and which he confessed were very numerous, would be removed.

Lord Stormont was certain the noble Lord would now gratify their Lordships with a full and impartial explanation. The noble Lord's situation in the government of this country afforded him many opportunities of acquiring such information as would enable him to give such an explanation. He hoped, therefore, the noble Lord would come forward, and satisfy their Lordships, which was more particularly expected from him, as being at the head of that department.

The Lord Chancellor said, he differed from the noble Lord who had just sat down; his noble friend, if he recollected right, gave as full an explanation as the nature and circumstances of the case admitted. So far as he was able to comprehend the noble Secretary, he did not understand that he ever gave any intimation of a further explanation, than what his Lordship had given in the course of the debate in the Committee, nor even the smallest reason to expect it. In his opinion the resolutions had undergone as full and as ample a discussion in the Committee as was sufficient; but whether they were satisfactory or not, was for their Lordships to determine. The only question now before them was, whether the report should be agreed to; and till some substantial objections were urged against it, he should think it but loss of time to dissent.

Lord Sidney replied with some warmth to the noble Lords who had so strenuously urged what he said he was very certain he had never given any reason to expect. He condemned the manner in which he was called upon for an explanation. The language of the noble Lords seemed to him rather peevish and personal. He did not approve of what was said by some of their Lordships, when they expressed themselves in the manner he had heard, namely, "in my poor judgment such a thing ought to be this way or that way," and immediately after assert, that such judgment ought to be the criterion by which their Lordships should be decided in their opinion. He contended that he had never given their Lordships the least intimation of any further explanation, than he before gave in the Committee.

Lord Stormont replied, still persisting in his first opinion, that the noble Secretary had given every reason to expect a further explanation.

Lord Hawke said a few words in exculpation of the noble Secretary.

Earl Fitzwilliam urged the importance of the debate they were then upon, said it should be considered, that this system was to be final, and of course irrevocable; and that what they now assented to would never come before their Lordships again: With respect to Ireland, they were to settle a measure that involved in it the dearest rights and liberties of the people of that country, which, in his opinion, required the most serious and weighty attention, as too much consideration could not be given to a subject of so vast and extensive a nature. One end was to guard the shipping of this country; but instead of doing so, it would tend to its ruin and destruction. The noble Earl used many other arguments, which he had urged with much ability on a former occasion, and concluded with giving the motion his most hearty opposition.

The Duke of Richmond said, the noble Secretary had given a full explanation on a former day. His Grace then took an extensive view of the resolutions and the arguments urged by the noble Lords in opposition, who had asserted that there was no necessity for a commercial treaty.—To him such arguments appeared so very trivial and transitory, that he thought it unnecessary to take up their Lordships time in giving any answer to them. He would, however, be glad to trespass on their Lordships' patience for a few moments. His Grace then stated the different attempts that had been made to bring about such a measure from the year 1778, to the present period, both by Lord North and the Marquis of Rockingham, whose death he should always mention with much concern. He then read the motion of address, which the noble Marquis had moved in the year 1782, wherein the commercial treaty was mentioned. His Grace dwelt for some time on this part of his speech, observing, that as an Englishman, an Irishman, or a Scotchman, he could not be affected by these Resolutions, but as a Frenchman, he was very certain he should. The measure, however, he trusted, would prove so advantageous to both countries, that he was persuaded it would lay a firm foundation for that unanimity and good affection which ought to subsist between this country and Ireland; and concluded with giving the motion his hearty concurrence.

Earl Fitzwilliam said a few words, by way of explanation; and did his Grace of Richmond in reply.

Lord Sackville made a very masterly speech, which he began by stating, that had the resolutions been so formed and shaped as to give satisfaction to both countries, he should have been the first to give his assent to them; but the more he considered them, the more he was inclined to think that they never would tend to bring about that reconciliation of both countries, which he supposed was the wish of the first fugger, and of every supporter of them in both countries. The noble Lord now took occasion to enter into an examination of the conduct of the Irish as well as of the British Parliament, respecting the commercial regulations of both countries. In 1780, the Irish appeared perfectly contented with the commercial regulations then made. In 1782, they made other requisitions which had also been granted, and from thence they occasionally advanced in their demands till the present system was formed. In this last he condemned the conduct of administration as highly impolitic and absurd. Instead of healing any breach that might be supposed to exist between the two countries, the present resolutions were likely to increase it, and to promote jealousy and discord between them. Had the ministers been anxious to carry properly into execution so desirable an object, they ought to have avoided a parliamentary discussion, as in such a case the variety of opinion gives rise to innumerable doubts and difficulties which are not easily to be surmounted: The proper method, therefore, of conducting such a business, in his opinion, was for administration to move an address to his Majesty, to advise commissioners to be appointed to treat with a like number on the part of Ireland, to enter into a negotiation for forming such a system as would lay the basis of a bill, which, whenever brought before Parliament, might undergo such a discussion as the Parliament of both countries should think proper to give it. But the Irish had not solicited this measure, on the contrary it was clear to their Lordships that they execrated it.—The noble Lord here entered into the discussion of that part of the resolutions which related to Ireland, condemned them as they then stood, and said they were hostile to the kingdom, therefore could not be acceptable to the people.—He considered them as so very hostile, that he believed it would be much easier to bring about an Union with Ireland, than a cordial agreement with them on the present plan. Would Ireland, added he, give up her whole power and authority to submit to the abject condition of a conquered nation? Would the Irish, who were so tenacious, so fond, so proud of their independence, sacrifice that and every thing else that was dear to them as men possessing freedom, and living in a land of liberty, to become British slaves? No, they would not. They would revolt at the idea. What then was to be done, or what was to be the determination of the long-continued labours of that House in this system? His Lordship concluded with recommending in the strongest terms to administration to suspend any further progress in it, and to endeavour as soon as possible to put the plan into execution which he had recommended, as the only effectual means of reconciling both countries. His Lordship therefore trusted he should be supported in the motion which he should now propose, which was, "That the further discussion of the Irish resolutions be postponed to this day four months."

Lord Scarborough spoke in favour of the motion, wishing further time to be given for the discussion of the subject; and recommended, in language pretty strong, the appointment of Commissioners.

Lord Townshend argued in favour of the principle of the system of commercial intercourse with Ireland, though he said he could not approve of all its parts; and professed himself a friend to Ireland, so far as the interests of Great Britain were not injured.

Lord Camelford replied to the arguments of the noble Viscount (Sackville) respecting the appointment of Commissioners, stating the great difficulties Commissioners must subject themselves to in such a case, as they would be responsible for the result of the regulations they should propose. It was an office, therefore, he should by no means wish to accept, even were he possessed of every requisite for so arduous an undertaking.

Lord Carlisle defended the propriety of postponing the further consideration of this subject.

Lord Camden, in a very elaborate speech, recapitulated the arguments he had urged on a former day in the Committee, and concluded with giving the motion his negative.

The Lords Dudley, Derby, Sydney, Stormont, Lord Chancellor, and Earl Fitzwilliam afterwards spoke. At last the House divided, when there appeared,

The resolutions were then read, and the amendments made in the Committee agreed to; after which several other amendments were moved by the Lords Sydney and Stormont; the former of which were agreed to, but those of the latter rejected. Adjourned at three o'clock in the morning.

LONDON, July 19.

The House of Commons did no business yesterday, for want of a sufficient number of members, fifteen only attending, and it being necessary to have forty to form a House.

Government have altered their intention of taking up transports to send out troops to Jamaica. The two battalions on the Irish establishment, ordered for that island, will be carried out by the merchant ships that sail the earliest; and an agreement is now entering into by the Navy-Board with the merchants for that purpose. The Ordnance stores are however to be conveyed by the Ordnance transports, of which six are continued in the service to carry stores to and from the several settlements, besides the hoys employed in carrying guns, &c. from one yard to another, and in bringing iron cannon from the manufactories of Scotland, &c.

Next week the ships which are to go out to the East Indies this season, will be tendered to the East-India Directors; and it is expected they will be taken up in the course of a fortnight.

WIND AT DEALE, JULY 18. S. W.

EDINBURGH.

Extract of a letter from London, July 19.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

"Sir James Johnstone brought up the bill for the better encouragement of seamen and marines, for entering into his Majesty's service in time of necessity; and the same was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading to-morrow."

"The House went into a Committee on the bill for extending the time for delivering in the navy and victualling transport bills, the Marquis of Graham in the chair, which, after being gone through, was ordered to be reported."

"The House read a third time the medicine duty bill, and ordered it to the Lords."

"An account was presented from Lord Sydney's office, of the inland duties of Ireland; and ordered to lie on the table."

"A message came from the Lords, requesting a conference on the subject matter of the former conference; upon which the same persons who managed the last conference proceeded to the Painted Chamber, where having sat down with a Committee of the Lords, the Duke of Chandos delivered the propositions, with amendments, also a copy of the evidence received, and the papers that had been sent with the propositions from the Commons. After which, the Committee returned back to the Commons. The Duke of Chandos, the Earl of Mornington, Lord Chedworth, Lord Amherst, Earl of Effingham, Lord Walsingham, Lord Hawke, and Lord Galloway, were the managers on the part of the Lords."

"Mr Pitt brought up the propositions, which, he informed the House, were received from the Lords, with amendments, for their concurrence, and they were ordered to lie on the table."

"The propositions were then ordered to be printed for the use of the members, and it was moved for them to be taken into consideration on Friday next."

"Mr Eden said he had amendments to propose, but that he should not propose them till Friday, with which he was content as the day on which the propositions should be taken into consideration."

"Mr Pitt observed, that he knew nothing of the amendments, but trusted that they would be found such as to deserve the concurrence of the House; if they should, however, be found otherwise, he would be one amongst those to object to them."

"Mr Fox said, he should offer no amendment at present, but that, if the House should do its duty, many amendments would yet be made on the propositions."

"It was then put, and carried, that the propositions should be considered on Friday."

"The House then went into a Committee on the aforesaid bill, Mr Gilbert in the chair."

"The Attorney General brought up a clause for exempting solicitors of public boards from paying duty."

"Sir James Johnstone very strongly objected to the exempting solicitors of public boards, as they were a description of people employed by Government, and well able to pay the tax."

"Mr Dundas intimated, that he had received an application from the clerks of the signet, that they might be exempted from the duty, being appointed or permitted to practise by the Crown, and considering themselves as a higher order of attorneys than the generality of persons acting under that description. The Hon. Gentleman, however, did not think it proper to trouble the House therewith, as he did not think any of the profession should be exempted from the tax."

"Mr Dempster, Sir Adam Ferguson, Mr Mainwaring, Mr Gascoigne senior, and Mr Eden, also severally spoke against the clause, upon which the Attorney-General withdrew it."

"Mr Dempster brought up a clause for exempting promoters from paying the 2 s. 6 d. stamp-duty, in the inferior courts of Scotland, in all actions up to ten pounds."

"Sir James Johnstone objected to it, as the tax, in his opinion, ought to go to all parts; and he thought the tax proper in Scotland, to check the spirit of going to law, for the people there were law mad."

"Sir Adam Ferguson was for the exemption, and said it was but right, as the courts of law differed in Scotland from those in England, in which latter place there were inferior courts, in which the duty was not paid."

"The Attorney General said, the courts were the same in England as in Scotland, and objected to the exemption; he said, that he would drop all further objections for the present if the Hon. Gentleman (Mr Dempster) would withdraw the clause till the bill should be reported."

"Mr Dempster agreed to this, and the House adjourned."

"The Parliament is expected to be prorogued either Friday or Monday se'ennight."

Mr and Mrs Cramer, Master Cramer, Mr Tenducci, Miss Maden, are expected this evening at Dunn's Hotel, London.

About two miles from Coldstream, a man and two horses (belonging to Turnbull at Crookfies, near Hirlie) were struck dead, and cart and coach set fire to by the lightning. Another cart who was a little behind with another cart, providentially escaped unhurt.

guard, within the walls, pressed forward into the Shakespeare, and attempted to displace those gentlemen who occupied the back rows. Riot and confusion ensued; and Mrs Siddons was interrupted in the last solemn and interesting scene of Douglas, for a full quarter of an hour. The officers are not unknown; and shall not pass without censure, if they are allowed to pass without punishment. Offences of this nature are the common cause of the Public, and had on this occasion the collected indignation of the audience. But the tameness of an Edinburgh audience is become proverbial; and indignation is all it has the courage to bestow. If it is thus permitted with impunity to trample on the respect and decency which ought to be observed in a Theatre—the school for manners; and at a time too, when the company consists of the politest, there is an end to all order; and it were better to shut the doors for ever. Similar outrages were, frequent during winter; but, in comparison of the present, were not to be considered. The audience, then, were pretty much at their ease.—But, now that every breath labours through each successive scene with all the weight of passion, a whisper is an insult.—What then is a riot?—Let the guardians of our police look to it, or they shall hear further from

The pleasant and agreeable VILLA of NORTH MERCHISTONE, in the parish of St Cuthbert's or West Kirk, and county of Mid-Lothian. It lies upon the Glasgow and Slateford roads, along which there is a stretch of above 2500 feet, whereof upwards of 600 is a fruit-wall. It is within twenty minutes walk of the Cross of Edinburgh, and consists of 35 acres, 1 rood, 1 fall Scots measure, all lying contiguous, inclosed with stone walls, and subdivided with hedges and sunk fences. The whole of the plantations are in a very thriving condition, and many of the trees are valuable being full grown, and from 50 to 60 years old; and the shrubberies and gravel walks are laid out with taste, and so conducted as to catch the different prospects, which are delightful. There is a fine piece of water of near an acre, and a command of water running through the ground, which may be increased, as there is a power of collecting all the springs in the park of Old Merchistone. There is easy and free access by turnpike roads both to the east and west; and there is also a power of having an access to the fourth by Bruntsfield Links and Barrowmuir-head.

The House consists of a hall, a dining-room, drawing-room, six bed-rooms with closets, house-keeper's room, kitchen, scullery, servants-room, cellars, pantry, and garrets with servants beds. And the offices consist of milk-house, laundry, washing-house, two stables, whereof the one contains two, and the other three horses, with a corn chamber over head, a coach house, hen-house, farm servants house, a work-horse stable that will contain twelve horses, two byres for two cows each, three detached necessary houses, a barn with a catacomb cellar at one end of it, and a granary and servants-room overhead, a shed in the hay-yard, and a gardener's house at the gate. The vicinity of these grounds to the city of Edinburgh, renders them useful and valuable in every respect; and the distance from the New Town is considerably shortened, and the access to it greatly improved by the Lothian road, and will be still more so by other roads that will soon be made in its neighbourhood, and by the South Bridge across the Cowgate.

The ground that lies to the fourth of the Glasgow road may be divided into four places for separate villas, as it contains 29 acres, 1 rood, 27 falls. And the other field that lies between the Glasgow and Slateford roads, consisting of 5 acres, 3 roods, 14 falls, is a proper situation for another villa, or may be fenced out for small houses and yards to great advantage; and will likewise answer for washing and drying linen, as there is a constant spring of water that runs through it, and is very substantially inclosed with a stone and lime wall.

The lands are held of two different superiors for a feu-duty of 54 l. 2s. 6d. The entries of an heir and singular successor are taxed.

There is a proportion of seat-room in the West Church, which has been lately rebuilt.
